

Interface design · round one

Trading desk

A private desk that watches currency pairs and US stocks against your own written systems, and tells you, with reasons, when a setup appears.

October 2026

Your system on paper, made live.

Your method began as typed course pages worked with a desk calculator. The interface keeps that working-paper character: exact figures, ruled structure, nothing decorative. The one bold element is the indicator ring, which is unique to your method.

Five seconds to a decision

Direction, instrument, entry, stop, target and the reason are visible the moment you open an alert.

Blue and amber, never red and green

Long and short stay distinct for colour-blind readers, and always appear with an arrow and a word.

Figures you can trust

Every price is set in tabular figures and right-aligned, so columns read like a ledger.

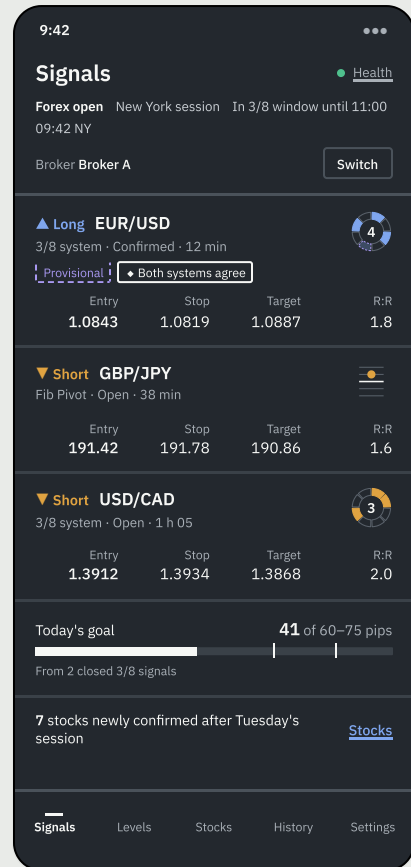

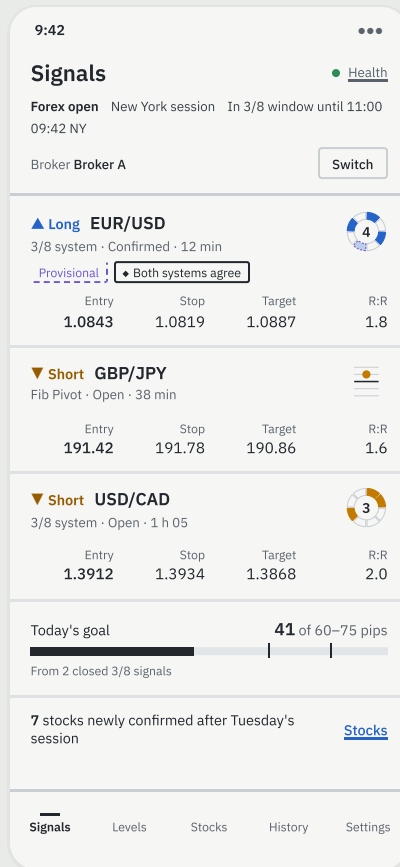

The 3/8 indicator ring

Eight segments, one per indicator, in the order your document lists them, clockwise from the top. Filled means fired. Outlined means not fired. Dashed violet means the rule is still waiting for your approval. It appears large on a signal, small in lists, and as the app icon.

Dashboard

Open signals first, newest at the top, each with its ring, prices and reward-to-risk. Above them: market status, the trading window and your active broker. Below: progress toward today's pip goal and the stock digest. Light and dark themes follow your phone.

Signal detail

One scrolling page answers why. The trade plan shows reference and broker-adjusted prices side by side. Below it: the large ring, each of the eight indicators with its level, the gates passed, a 15-minute chart with every level drawn, and the signal’s timeline.
